Introduction

I was surprised when I started to compile this list by how many people are working with glass in Scotland today. Although the industrial side continues to decline, the number of glass artists and craft workers has grown dramatically since the beginning of the studio glass movement in the country during the 1960s. The book Scotland's Glass: 400 Years of Glassmaking, 1610-2010 by Shiona Airlie and Brian Blench finally makes a comprehensive history available (see inside rear cover for details).

This booklet reveals the wealth of glass made in Scotland today: stained glass, traditional and modern; fine art to the highest standards; and innovative beads, jewellery and engraving, which ranges from one-off copper-wheel and diamond-point work to higher-volume production. A few companies continue to produce technical and scientific glass, and products for giftware, but most of the entries are individuals or small teams making all manner of decorative goods.

Having a window or glass vessel custom-made is not expensive and you could ask some of the people listed here if they can create objects based on your ideas. Some will even teach you how to do it yourself!

Scotland also boasts many fine galleries where the work of those listed can be purchased, but these were not included in this booklet, as there were far too many.

The museums of Scotland house a vast heritage of the earliest known Scottish glass. For glass collectors, Scotland has a lot to offer: from fine exhibition-quality examples from the 19th century such as the work of Christopher Dresser to the 20th century Monart and Vasart glass and the more modern styles of Caithness Glass, Edinburgh

Crystal and others. Glass from earlier times is much harder to find, yet there must still be many pieces sitting in cupboards, forgotten and unidentified. The output of the many bottle works is also hard to pin down but the whisky bottle collector has many opportunities from the labels.

Today, we often look for information on the Internet and Scotland's glass features there too. I built the site Ysartglass.com some 10 years ago and it has grown and grown with input from collectors worldwide. Scotlandsglass.co.uk was started to provide a space for the rest. Using open source software, it is intended to be owned and run by the community. In addition to offering encyclopaedic coverage of all glass Scottish, it acts as a community hub for its users. Everyone is welcome to get involved, just get in touch.

About the Listings

Although I tried to locate and contact everyone involved in glass, there are omissions; the on-line version of the listings will be updated throughout 2010. The Scottish Glass Society and CraftScotland.org both list their members on their websites: see the organisations section for details. Those makers we did not get first-hand confirmation from are listed to the best of our ability. These are coloured blue, as they may contain errors.

There are many more buildings containing interesting glass than those listed, but I have tried to find the more usual and important ones, as well as a selection of those with recent installations.

Enjoy discovering how 400 years on, Scotland's glass stays alive.

A Selection of Buildings where Glass is evident

Scotland has a rich heritage of buildings with stained glass and its many glass practitioners continue to maintain those existing, as well as introduce modern design. Fused, etched and engraved glass is also being increasingly used in public buildings and private homes. But glass is also used as a structural material and here specified by architects more than artists. Traquair House, near Edinburgh also has an important collection of glass: see entry below under EH. But there are many, many more examples to be found all over Scotland. From FolkArt to Industrial uses.

Loch Maree in Wester Ross where glass started in Scotland shows no trace of the iron and glass foundries (archaeologists please note!), but it is still a beautiful spot to visit. There are still some sand mining operations for glass in Scotland but the most remarkable is Lochaline (see photo, right), which is one of the few underground sand mines in the world that operated from the 1940s to 2008. Not open to the public but has the potential to be a remarkable tourist attraction with its vaulted caverns created from extraction of the fine quality sand. Alloa and Perth offer the best of preserved glass history in Scotland.

A NEW BOOK on the history of Scottish glassmaking. From humble beginnings, it prospered to become a centre of excellence. Within this book the 400 years of Scottish glassmaking history is explored and richly illustrated with many photographs of items that have never been seen before: rare and amazing glass from the 17th to the 21st century.

- ❖ Glasses actually used by Prince Charles Edward in 1745
- ❖ A massive, one metre tall epergne produced in 1837 for Queen Victoria's accession
- ❖ Bottles from the 18th and 19th centuries
- ❖ Rare examples of Clutha glass
- ❖ Exquisite 19th century engraving by Millar and Keller.
- ❖ Examples from Monart, Ysart, Vasart, Strathearn, Caithness
- ❖ The most prominent names in Scottish glassmaking examined: Sir George Hay, John Ford, John Baird, and 20th century notables such as Salvador Ysart, Helen Monro Turner, Alison Geissler, Alison Kinnaird
- ❖ Paperweight examples from Ysart, Caithness, Perthshire, Selkirk and individual craftsmen
- ❖ Stunning 20th century studio art glass and sculptures
